APPENDIX B

Electronic Data Base Literature Searches

Appendix B - Electronic Data Base Literature Searches

A search statement is formed using the compilation of technical keywords which need to appear in the text of each of the articles. The technical staff reviews the search results to determine the applicability of each article to the desired topic of interest. Overall, Versar conducted six searches which yielded twenty articles that were determined to be useful for this project.

An initial search was performed in all of the science related data base files found in Dialog with the following strategy:

washington and environ? (all variations of the word) and human health and risk assessment

Thirty data base files were shown to have at least one or more possible hits. A "hit" is an article which satisfies the search statement criteria. These "hits" may or may not be applicable to the desired search topic and are reviewed by technical staff to determine if they appear to be useful for the study. Toxline was one of the files with the greatest number of hits. Toxline was searched through Medlars. Adding "dc" to the search statement produced 417 hits. Approximately 20 titles were printed out, found not to be relevant to this study, and the search strategy was re-evaluated.

In a subsequent search, all science related data base files found in Dialog were searched with the following strategy:

district of columbia and human health and environmental (health or risk)

Eight database files were shown to have at least one or more possible hits. From those eight database files, twenty-two records were retrieved. Bibliographic citations pulled on these records again revealed that few of the articles were pertinent to this study (most were articles related to medicine, psychology, etc.)

A new search was devised and executed on all science related data base files found in Dialog using the following two strategies:

district of columbia and (exposure or risk or toxic?(all variations of the word)) and (environ?(all variations of the word) or pesticide)

Seventy-two data base files were shown to have at least one or more possible hits. The search was run again in the nine data base files which were judged to be most applicable. After the reduction of duplicate records, there were 241 records retrieved. All titles were printed out. Eighteen articles of those 241 records were of interest (other articles were related to medicine, drug abuse, and health related policies). These articles were obtained for use in this report.

The second (related) search strategy was:

district of columbia and health and environ?(all variations of the word) and (exposure or risk or toxic?(all variations of the word)) and (pollutant or contaminant or pesticide)

Twenty-seven data base files had one or more possible hits. The search was run again in four of the 27 data base files which seemed most applicable. After the reduction of duplicate records, there were 18 records retrieved. All titles were printed out. Of those 18 records, two articles were of interest. These articles were obtained for use in this report.

Searches for Dissertations

A Dissertations Abstract On-line service through George Mason University was searched using the following strategy:

district of columbia and health

There were Sixty-six hits listed. The search was modified to:

district of columbia and health and environment

There were six hits listed. All six records were printed out. None of the records retrieved were relevant to this study.

A comprehensive listing of all the science related data base files found in Dialog and Medlars containing possible hits has been provided in Table B-1.

Table B-1. List of data base files searched in dialog.

RARE PLANTS AND ANIMALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

National Park Service
District of Columbia Natural Heritage Program
July, 1995

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA NATURAL HERITAGE PROGRAM

The District of Columbia Natural Heritage Program, included in the National Capital Region Conservation Data Center, was initiated in 1994 and is managed by the National Park Service, National Capital Region, in cooperation with The Nature Conservancy. The D.C. Natural Heritage Program, as a part of the nationwide Natural Heritage network, evaluates and tracks those elements of the District's flora, fauna, and natural communities of highest conservation concern. The NCR Conservation Data Center is a cooperative effort between the National Park Service and the Maryland and West Virginia Natural Heritage Programs and the Virginia Division of Natural Heritage to facilitate conservation planning and rare species protection within parks of the National Capital Region.

If you have information on any of the species on these lists for the District of Columbia, can make recommendations for inclusions, deletions, or rank changes, or can offer suggestions on how the lists might be made more useful, please contact the District of Columbia Natural Heritage Program.

ABOUT THE LISTS

The following lists of extant and historical rare vascular plant and animal species known from the District of Columbia should be regarded as a preliminary assessment. It is provided to give some guidance to interested individuals and organizations. The District of Columbia Natural Heritage Program has very recently compiled a list of most species known to have occurred in the District from many historical records in scientific collections and literature. From this list, those species recognized as rare or extirpated in Maryland (by the Maryland Natural Heritage Program), Virginia (by the Virginia Division of Natural Heritage), or both were chosen as immediate candidates for the District's list of rare plants and animals.

Plants

A review of literature indicated that several native species recorded for the District have not been recorded for Maryland or Virginia. These and several species not considered rare in these two neighboring states, but obviously locally rare, were added to the preliminary list to yield 239 species. Of this total, the District of Columbia Natural Heritage Program has assigned a preliminary rank of "Rare" to the 23 species known to be extant within the District, to form the first plant list (page 3). The other species have been assigned a preliminary rank of "Historical" and are included on the second plant list (page 4). It should be understood that, at the time of this document, these ranks are supported by only limited field surveys. Many of the species listed as "Historical" may still exist within the District and should be considered "Rare" and of some conservation concern, should they be found to occur naturally within the District.

Animals

Rare animals of the District are also presented in 2 lists. The first, "District of Columbia Rare Animals" (page 9) includes rare animal species which are well documented to be or have been native species in the District. The second list, "Potential District of Columbia Rare Animals" (page 11), is of rare animal species which probably have existed and, in some cases, may still exist, in the District, but for which conclusive occurrence evidence is still lacking. Animal species known or believed to be extirpated from the District are marked and denoted on the lists.

It should be noted that rankings for birds and other migratory species are for breeding occurrences only. Thus, while species such as the bald eagle, spotted sandpiper, and sharp-shinned hawk may occur in the District with some regularity as migrants, a breeding occurrence of these species would be considered rare or historically significant.

Other Information About the Lists

These plant and animal lists do not include other locally rare species which may warrant inclusion, but whose rarity and level of security within the District has not been evaluated.

Conservation ranking is an iterative process that evolves as information from field surveys and other sources is gained. It is likely that these rankings will change significantly over the next several years. An update is planned by spring of 1996. Traditional Natural Heritage Global and "State" rankings for the species will be listed at that time.

The District of Columbia Natural Heritage Program assesses species' rarity for use in conservation planning, resource management, research, education, and other activities, but is not a regulatory agency. The rankings assigned by the program are biological opinions and do not represent a legal status, although plants may be protected by existing laws and regulations. The column "Federal Status" indicates the federal status of a species, if it has one, as determined by the U.S. Fish & Wildlife Service. Explanations of the codes used in this column are denoted in footnotes to the lists.

Scientific nomenclature for plants generally follows A Synonymized Checklist of the Vascular Flora of the United States Canada, and Greenland by J. T. Kartesz: (1994). In cases for which a familiar alternative scientific name has been extensively used in regional references, the alternative name is placed in parentheses next to the nomenclature used by Kartesz. Common names are provided for convenience of the user; however, it should be understood that common names for plants are not standardized, and a species may be known by several common names.

¹C2 = Candidate, Category 2. The taxon is possibly in danger of extinction or likely to become endangered within the foreseeable future throughout all or a significant portion of its range, but conclusive data on vulnerability and threat(s) are not currently available to support listing under the federal Endangered Species Act.

²3C = The taxon has been considered for federal listing, but has been determined to be more abundant or widespread than previously believed and/or is not subject to any identifiable threat.

³LT = Listed Threatened. The taxon is likely to become endangered within the foreseeable future.
